Fifth Sunday After Pentecost

The people to whom the gospel is to speak today are not huddled fearfully in the shadow of ancient altars, trying to work out the exact implications of rigorous commandments. They are, rather, wandering about aimlessly, troubled by the increasing suspicion that no one literally gives a . . . about what they do. The problem of our time is not an obsessive sense of the meaning of human existence, but a terrible dread, a deep anxiety that the whole show is indeed an archaic charade. To tell such [people] in such circumstances that they are accepted without reference to the quality of their lives is to confirm the worst of their darkest fears.
